WHO IS A HINDU?

How evangelical models inspire Hindu gurudoms

Gurus often use models of institution building that are employed by various Catholic and Protestant groups around the world

For many people, guru is no different from a church elder, or even a prophet. Just as a prophet has direct access to God and communicates God's message, many people believe that their guru has direct access to the divine and presents the wisdom of the divine. If the guru becomes a prophet, then his guru becomes the church and the satsang that he prescribes often becomes the congregation. And when someone of the God is transmitted to people. The holy book then becomes the guru's most favorite book — either the Upadesha or the Loga Sutra or the Brugavata Purana or the Isha Sutra or the Bhagavad Gita. Guru becomes Krishna, becoming more important than Krishna or Devi, or the formless Niranjan Brahman, becoming more important than Sagesa Brahman, which form.

Then there is another belief that has to cling to, no matter what arguments are presented. This is very different from the dynamic nature of the guru. This is the belief that guru is about the unknotting of the mind,

In the Catholic church, the ashram then starts providing education and hospital services, which is what makes the church very powerful and famous around the world. Sunday schools are organised to teach the young ones. Baptism and conversion become the shudhikara or purification ritual. You are purified away from sins and you are reborn. In other ways of thinking, ideas that did not exist before, the idea of a superior god and an inferior god — which do not exist in Hinduism — start to intrude.

Therefore, god becomes transcendental and hierarchy is created with forms of deities. Guru becomes more important than Krishna, becoming more important than Krishna or Devi, or the formless Niranjan Brahman, becoming more important than Sagesa Brahman, which form.

Then there is another belief that has to cling to, no matter what arguments are presented. This is very different from the dynamic nature of the guru. This is the belief that guru is about the unknotting of the mind, expanding. In Yoga, there is no singular idea; the idea keeps changing as the mind expands following exposure to more ideas.

The Christian temples also become important. They are built to honour Jesus, the return to Jerusalem and the great martyrdom with suffering under the cross. The crucifixion is central to the Gospel. These themes become similar to the idea of Hinduism being weaker than Christianity. Hinduism is asked to yield and to relocate it, through books such as Arche Aranya, or Avashan Bharata. Dharma Shishya becomes a Christian and Dharma Shishapana becomes the refinement of religion. The word guru becomes a symbol of quality rather than figuring out the underlying principle — the common denominator that binds us all.

Despite saying that Hinduism is totally different from Christianity, the guru adopted by many Hindus is closer to that of Christianity itself, often evangelical and charismatic movements popular in USA. These groups, many times, positions themselves as missions, and find great joy in converts who completely adopt Hindu names. Those who have adopted new words are to different from evangelists who are spreading "the good word" and who are not interested in the chauvinism, the leaders of Born Again movements, who can say anything against science with a climate and environment angle. They believe that someone seen as reinforcement of mysticism and spirituality.

It is interesting to note that while people taking Hinduism and its titles like saffron, shanti, and parandit almost exclusively after conversion to the guru. This is a privilege not given to a Dalit man in India. If you are a Dalit, you cannot just learn Sanskrit and become a Brahmin. You have to be born into it. Even just a few words of Sanskrit will make you a Brahmin, instantaneously. This upper caste privilege is still there.

Hinduism being transmitted around the world through gurudoms is often seen as a strategy to spread Hinduism or very strategically using models of institution building used by Catholic and Protestant groups around the world.
